INTRODUCTION

2 Amici Law Professors, all experts in constitutional law and specifically the law of 3 religious liberty and/or immigration law, seek to provide the court with the proper 4 framework within which to consider Defendants' motion to dismiss grounded in the 5 Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb–1 (hereinafter "RFRA"). This 6 case raises important questions regarding the application of RFRA as a defense in a 7 criminal prosecution; thus, it is imperative that the Court structure its ruling on the RFRA 8 motion to dismiss in a way that will provide clear guidance to the parties herein and to 9 other parties and courts in the future. As experts in the law of religious liberty in general, 10 and in RFRA in particular, we are concerned that the Government's brief misstates well-11 settled law on the basic elements of the RFRA case. We offer this amicus brief to help 12 guide the Court's reasoning on the application of RFRA in this case.
13
15

16 Congress enacted RFRA in 1993 in response to the Supreme Court's holding in 17 Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), that the Free Exercise Clause of the 18 First Amendment "does not relieve an individual of the obligation to comply with a valid 19 and neutral law of general applicability." Id. at 879 (internal quotation marks omitted).
20 With RFRA, Congress sought "to restore the compelling interest test as set forth in 21 Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963) and Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)," 22 that had been altered by the Court in Smith. 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb(b)(1). By reinstating as 23 a statutory matter the pre-Smith free exercise standard, Congress recognized that laws of 24 general applicability may, in some cases, impose a substantial burden on the religious 25 exercise of some persons. Congress required that in circumstances where religious 26
27
28

1 exercise is substantially burdened by state action, the government must justify such 2 burden as furthering a compelling interest through narrowly tailored means. The 3 Supreme Court affirmed this interpretation of the reach of RFRA in Gonzales v. O Centro 4 Espirita Beneficente Uniao do Vegetal, 546 U.S. 418, 424 (2006) (“the Federal 5 Government may not, as a statutory matter, substantially burden a person’s exercise of 6 religion, ‘even if the burden results from a rule of general applicability.’”) (quoting 42 7 U.S.C. § 2000bb–1(a)). RFRA aims to provide substantial protection to the free exercise 8 of religion while recognizing that this right is not absolute, insofar as it must yield where 9 necessary for the government to implement a compelling public interest, or where the 10 rights of third parties, for instance other citizens, are burdened by the overly solicitous 11 accommodation of an individual’s religious belief. Further, the First Amendment’s 12 Establishment Clause imposes a limit on the extent to which the government may 13 accommodate the religious beliefs of citizens, as the government must ensure that an 14 “accommodation [is] measured so that it does not override other significant interests” and 15 does not “differentiate among bona fide faiths.” Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 722-16 23 (2005).

17
18 19 20 21 22 Through a process of strict judicial review, RFRA creates the possibility of 23 discrete religious exemptions to those whose religious activities are constrained by 24 neutral laws of general applicability.<sup>1</sup> To receive an exemption under RFRA, a claimant 25 need not demonstrate that the challenged law or policy singles out any particular group

1 for special harm—such a law would be unconstitutional under the Free Exercise and 2 Establishment Clauses of the First Amendment, making a RFRA exemption unnecessary.
3 See Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 534 (1993).
4 Nor need a defendant show that he or she believes the challenged law cannot exist at all.
5 RFRA is not a means of challenging the application of a law or policy generally, but of 6 challenging a particular enforcement of the law to the extent that it conflicts with a 7 particular person’s specific religious practices.

10 Under RFRA, the federal government may not “substantially burden” a person’s 11 religious exercise, even where the burden results from a religiously neutral, generally 12 applicable law that might be constitutionally valid under Smith, unless the imposition of 13 such a burden is the least restrictive means to serve a compelling governmental interest.
14 The person claiming a RFRA defense must show (i) that he or she holds a belief that is 15 religious in nature; (ii) that that belief is sincerely held; and (iii) that his or her exercise of 16 religious belief was substantially burdened by a federal law or policy. Once the person 17 claiming a RFRA defense has made out this showing, the burden shifts to the government 18 to show that (i) it has a compelling interest; and (ii) that interest is being accomplished 19 through the least restrictive means. 42 U. S. C. §§ 2000bb–1(a), (b).
20
21
22

23 The Defendants’ assertion of a faith-based exemption from prosecution in this 24 case falls squarely within the intended meaning of RFRA. The Supreme Court 25 recognized the application of RFRA to criminal prosecutions in Gonzalez v. O Centro 26 Espirita Beneficente Uniao do Vegetal, 546 U.S. 418 (2006), finding an exemption to 27 enforcement of the Controlled Substances Act, 84 Stat. 1242, as amended, 21 U.S.C.
28

1 § 801 et seq. (2000 ed. and Supp. I): “A person whose religious practices are burdened in 2 violation of RFRA ‘may assert that violation as a claim or defense in a judicial 3 proceeding and obtain appropriate relief.’ § 2000bb–1(c).” Id. at 424. Many courts in 4 the Ninth Circuit have recognized the jurisdiction of federal courts to entertain RFRA-5 based motions to dismiss in criminal cases, including their adjudication before trial after 6 an evidentiary hearing. United States v. Christie, 825 F.3d 1048, 1055 (9th Cir. 2016) 7 (“if the government strikes first—for example, by indicting a person for engaging in 8 activities that form a part of his religious exercise but are prohibited by law—the person 9 may raise RFRA as a shield in the hopes of beating back the government’s charge.”); see 10 also United States v. Bauer, 84 F.3d 1549 (9th Cir. 1996); Guam v. Guerrero, 290 F.3d 11 1210, 1222 (9th Cir. 2002); United States v. Tawahongva, 456 F. Supp. 2d 1120, 1129 12 (D. Ariz. 2006); United States v. Lepp, 2008 WL 3843283 (N.D. Cal. 2008); United 13 States v. Christie, 2013 WL 2181105 *3 (D. Haw. 2013). The Attorney General 14 specifically condoned the use of RFRA as a defense in federal criminal prosecutions in a 15 new section of the United States Attorneys’ Manual (USAM) Respect for Religious 16 Liberty, available at <https://www.justice.gov/jm/1-15000-respect-religious-liberty-0> 17 (“RFRA applies to all actions by federal administrative agencies, including ...
18 enforcement actions.”).

24 I. The RFRA Prima Facie Case

25 A. Do the Defendants Hold Beliefs That Are Religious in Nature?

26 With respect to the showing required by the party claiming a RFRA exemption, 27 the claimant must first show with “the evidence of persuasion,” 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-2(3), 28

1 that they hold a belief that is religious in nature. This showing requires courts to consider 2 the mixed question of whether, objectively, the claimant’s beliefs are “religious” and 3 whether, subjectively, the claimant themselves understood the beliefs to be religious.
4 RFRA covers “any exercise of religion, whether or not compelled by, or central to, a 5 system of religious belief.” Burwell v. Hobby Lobby, 573 U.S. ___, 134 S.Ct. 2751, 2762
6 (2014). RFRA provides protection to a wide diversity of religious practices, including 7 those that differ significantly from the Abrahamic traditions. Thus, a RFRA claimant 8 need not show that they believe in a singular deity, that their faith includes a house of 9 worship, or that they are a member of a recognizable congregation. “This [] inquiry 10 reflects our society’s abiding acceptance and tolerance of the unorthodox belief. Indeed, 11 the blessings of our democracy are ensconced in the first amendment’s unflinching 12 pledge to allow our citizenry to explore diverse religious beliefs in accordance with the 13 dictates of their conscience.” Patrick v. LeFevre, 745 F.2d 153, 157 (2d Cir. 1984).
14 “[W]e are a cosmopolitan nation made up of people of almost every conceivable religious 15 preference.” Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 606 (1961). “Our nation recognizes and 16 protects the expression of a great range of religious beliefs.” Navajo Nation v. U.S.
17 Forest Serv., 535 F.3d 1058, 1064 (9th Cir. 2008).

23 In considering whether a system of values or beliefs counts as religious for the 24 purposes of RFRA and similar federal statutes, courts have looked to several key indicia 25 of “religiosity” that implicate “‘deep and imponderable matters’ ... includ[ing] existential 26 matters, such as humankind’s sense of being; teleological matters, such as humankind’s 27 purpose in life; and cosmological matters, such as humankind’s place in the universe.”
28

1 Cavanaugh v. Bartelt, 178 F. Supp. 3d 819, 829 (D. Neb. 2016), aff'd (8th Cir. Sept. 7, 2 2016). Religious beliefs “often prescribe a particular manner of acting, or way of life, 3 that is ‘moral’ or ‘ethical’ ... [and] may create duties—duties often imposed by some 4 higher power, force, or spirit—that require the believer to abnegate elemental self-5 interest.” United States v. Meyers, 95 F.3d 1475, 1483 (10th Cir. 1996). Religiously 6 motivated witness, such as that undertaken by the Defendants herein, can be the kind of 7 faith-based duty that RFRA was designed to protect.

10 The Government implies at several points in its opposition to the Defendants’ 11 religious liberty-based motion to dismiss that their beliefs are political in nature, and 12 therefore not religious within the meaning of RFRA. See Doc. 105 at 8–9. When 13 addressing the question of whether a belief or ideology is religious in nature, courts have 14 found that an action or position does not lose its religious character merely because it 15 coincides with a particular political belief. Rigdon v. Perry, 962 F.Supp. 150, 164 16 (D.D.C. 1997) (a priest’s “desire to urge his Catholic parishioners to contact Congress on 17 legislation that would limit what he and many other Catholics believe to be an immoral 18 practice—partial birth abortion—is no less religious in character than telling parishioners 19 that it is their Catholic duty to protect every potential human life by not having abortions 20 and by encouraging others to follow suit.”). In McGowan v. State of Maryland, 366 U.S.
21 420 (1961), the Supreme Court provided examples of beliefs that may be grounded in 22 both religious and secular values, such as condemnation of murder, theft or fraud. In the 23 Establishment Clause context, a legal prohibition on murder, for instance, does not lose 24 its secular character simply because many religious traditions contain similar 25
26
27
28

1 prohibitions.

2           In Burwell v. Hobby Lobby Stores, Inc., the Supreme Court essentially applied 3 this interpretation of the meaning of “religious” as it appears in RFRA by finding that the 4 claimants’ opposition to contraceptive coverage was religious in nature even though it 5 also mirrored political beliefs about contraception and the Affordable Care Act held by 6 some persons for secular reasons. 573 U.S. ___, 134 S.Ct. 2751. At no time did the 7 Court find, or even suggest, that the beliefs of the RFRA claimants lost their religious 8 character because other parties held similar views on contraception, or on government 9 regulation of health care, for non-religious reasons. Thus, the question for the Court in 10 determining whether the RFRA claimant’s beliefs are religious in nature is not whether 11 others might hold the same values for secular reasons, but whether a value was held or an 12 action was taken by this claimant for reasons that are religious to them in their own 13 scheme of things. Similarly, the religiosity of the beliefs of the Defendants herein should 14 not be questioned merely because they happen to overlap with other parties’ secular 15 political beliefs about the rights of migrants. Rather, the Court must determine the mixed 16 question of whether, objectively, the claimant’s beliefs are “religious,” and whether, 17 subjectively, the claimant himself understood the beliefs to be religious. The fact that 18 others may hold similar beliefs for secular reasons is of no moment to this inquiry.

19           There remains a subjective factual component to the question of whether a 20 particular RFRA claimant’s belief system should be treated as religious: were they 21 considered by the claimant to be religious in nature? The central factual question is 22 “whether they are, in his own scheme of things, religious.” United States v. Seeger, 380 23
25
26
27
28

1 U.S. 163, 185 (1965) (emphasis added), with the aim of “differentiating between those 2 beliefs that are held as a matter of conscience and those that are animated by motives of 3 deception and fraud.” Isbell v. Ryan, 2011 WL 6050337 (D. Ariz. December 6, 2011) 4 (citing Patrick v. LeFevre, 745 F.2d 153, 157).

6 B. Are The Defendants’ Religious Beliefs Sincerely Held?

7 Second, the RFRA claimant must show that his or her religious beliefs are 8 sincerely held. Hobby Lobby, 134 S.Ct. at 2774 n. 28 (“To qualify for RFRA’s 9 protection, an asserted belief must be ‘sincere’....”). This element is a question of fact, 10 proven by the credibility of the party asserting a religion-based defense. United States v.
11 Zimmerman, 514 F.3d 851, 854 (9th Cir. 2007) (stating that sincerity is 12 “a question of fact”); Patrick v. LeFevre, 745 F.2d 153, 157 (2nd Cir. 1984) (the sincerity 13 analysis “demands a full exposition of facts and the opportunity for the factfinder to 14 observe the claimant’s demeanor during direct and cross- examination”); United States v.
15 Quaintance, 608 F.3d 717, 721 (10th Cir. 2010) (“[S]incerity of religious beliefs ‘is a 16 factual matter.’”); see generally Kara Loewentheil and Elizabeth Reiner Platt, In Defense 17 of the Sincerity Test, in RELIGIOUS EXEMPTIONS 247 (Kevin Vallier & Michael Weber 18 eds., 2018).

19 Rather than merely reducing this element to a matter of pleading and accepting the 20 RFRA claimants’ assertion of sincerity, the court must undertake a meaningful 21 assessment of the factual basis for the claim to sincerity, including examination of the 22 claimants’ demeanor. The Government argues that the Court cannot resolve at the 23 motion to dismiss stage the questions of whether defendants’ beliefs are religious in 24
25
26
27
28

1 nature and whether those beliefs are sincerely held. Doc. 105 at 9. Yet because the Court 2 will be sitting as factfinder in this case, the factual questions that underlie both of these 3 elements of the RFRA prima facie case can be resolved at an evidentiary hearing prior to 4 trial.<sup>2</sup> As noted earlier, it is not uncommon for courts to address a RFRA-based motion to 5 dismiss in a criminal case at the pre-trial stage, after an evidentiary hearing.

7 C. Are the Defendants Sincerely Held Religious Beliefs Substantially 8 Burdened by the Instant Prosecution?

9 Next, the party seeking a RFRA-based exemption must show that the exercise of 10 a sincerely held religious belief was substantially burdened by government action. This 11 element is a question of law for the court to decide. See Mahoney v. Doe, 642 F.3d 1112, 12 1121 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (stating that judicial inquiry into the substantiality of the burden 13 “prevent[s] RFRA claims from being reduced into questions of fact, proven by the 14 credibility of the claimant”); Kaemmerling v. Lappin, 553 F.3d 669, 679 (D.C. Cir. 2008) 15 (“[a]ccepting as true the factual allegations that Kaemmerling’s beliefs are sincere and of 16 a religious nature—but not the legal conclusion, cast as a factual allegation, that his 17 religious exercise is substantially burdened”); Eternal Word Television Network, Inc. v.
18 Sec’y of U.S. Dep’t of Health & Human Servs., 818 F.3d 1122, 1144–45 (11th Cir. 2016); 19 Priests For Life v. U.S. Dep’t of Health & Human Servs., 772 F.3d 229, 247 (D.C. Cir.
20
21
22
23

---

24 <sup>2</sup> Other courts have ruled that it is appropriate to resolve RFRA-based claims at the 25 motion stage. See e.g., United States v. Bauer, 84 F.3d 1549, 1559 (9th Cir. 1996) (“The 26 court may conduct a preliminary hearing in which the defendants will have the obligation 27 of showing that they are in fact Rastafarians and that the use of marijuana is a part of the 28 religious practice of Rastafarians.”); S. Fork Band Council of W. Shoshone of NV v. U.S.
Dep’t of the Int., 2009 WL 73257 *3 (D. Nev. Jan. 7, 2009) (“[B]ecause as a part of its preliminary injunction analysis the court will have to consider the likelihood of Plaintiffs’ success on the merits of the RFRA claim, an evidentiary hearing is appropriate.”).

1 2014), vacated on other grounds and remanded sub nom. Zubik v. Burwell, 136 S. Ct.
2 1557 (2016) (noting that eight circuits have held that the question of substantial burden 3 also presents “a question of law for courts to decide.”). As Professor Frederick Mark 4 Gedicks has argued persuasively, “[t]he rule of law demands that the determination 5 whether religious costs are substantial should be made by impartial courts.” Frederick 6 Mark Gedicks, “Substantial” Burdens: How Courts May (and Why They Must) Judge
7 Burdens on Religion Under RFRA, 85 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 94, 150–51 (2017).

10 The question of whether, as a matter of law, the RFRA claimant has shown a 11 substantial burden on his or her religious beliefs, “involves both subjective and objective 12 dimensions. Hobby Lobby made clear that there is a subjective aspect to this inquiry: 13 courts must accept a religious adherent’s assertion that his religious beliefs require him to 14 take or abstain from taking a specified action ... The objective inquiry requires courts to 15 consider whether the government actually ‘puts’ the religious adherent to the ‘choice’ of 16 incurring a ‘serious’ penalty or ‘engag[ing] in conduct that seriously violates [his or her] 17 religious beliefs.’” Eternal World Television, 818 F.3d at 1144 (citations omitted).
18

20 The Ninth Circuit has recognized two ways to understand the notion of substantial 21 burden in the RFRA context: (1) forcing a person to choose between the tenets of their 22 religion and a government benefit, and (2) being coerced to act contrary to religious 23 belief by threat of civil or criminal sanctions. Navajo Nation, 535 F.3d at 1069–70. The 24 second formulation applies most appropriately in this case, where the threat of 25 imprisonment and significant financial penalties will coerce the defendants to act in a 26 way that is contrary to their religious beliefs. This standard was elaborated upon further 27
28

1 by the Ninth Circuit in Snoqualmie Indian Tribe v. F.E.R.C., where the court described 2 the problem of burden as “a Catch–22 situation: exercise of their religion under fear of 3 civil or criminal sanction.” 545 F.3d 1207, 1214 (9th Cir. 2008).

5 The Government makes several arguments to support the position that the 6 defendants’ sincerely held religious beliefs have not been substantially burdened by 7 government action. Each of them, unfortunately, mischaracterizes the meaning of 8 “substantial burden” under RFRA.

10 First, the Government argues that the Defendants’ claim that their sincerely held 11 religious beliefs have been substantially burdened by the instant prosecution “is meritless 12 because the government’s choice of how to use its own land cannot create a substantial 13 burden.” Doc. 105 at 9. The Government relies upon Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery 14 Protective Ass’n, 485 U.S. 439 (1988), for this proposition, but Lyng provides no support 15 for the notion that government policy about land use cannot create a substantial burden 16 on the religious liberty rights of individuals. In Lyng, Native American individuals and 17 organizations contested the U.S. Forest Service’s plans to permit timber harvesting and 18 road construction in an area of national forest that was traditionally used for religious 19 purposes by members of three Native American tribes. These individuals and 20 organizations sought to enjoin the issuance of the timber permit. The Court denied their 21 claim on the ground, inter alia, that the “the affected individuals [would not] be coerced 22 by the Government’s action into violating their religious beliefs; nor would ...
23 governmental action penalize religious activity by denying any person an equal share of 24 the rights, benefits, and privileges enjoyed by other citizens.” Id. at 449. Thus in Lyng,

1 the government's action surely offended the religious beliefs of the affected individuals, 2 but the government took no action that imposed a negative penalty on those individuals.

3 By contrast, the government action in this case involves the affirmative 4 penalization of religiously-motivated behavior. This is precisely the kind of circumstance 5 anticipated by Congress when it passed RFRA and the Religious Land Use and 6 Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) (42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc, et seq.): the enforcement 7 of criminal laws of general application in a way that substantially burdens the religious 8 beliefs of individuals. The Attorney General's guidance on religious liberty echoes this 9 interpretation of RFRA: "individuals and organizations do not give up their religious-10 liberty protections by ... interacting with federal, state, or local governments." Attorney 11 General Jeff Sessions, Memorandum For All Executive Departments And Agencies, 12 "Federal Law Protections for Religious Liberty," October 6, 2017, p. 2, available at 13 <https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1001891/download> (hereinafter "Federal 14 Law Protections for Religious Liberty"). In Navajo Nation, the Ninth Circuit found that 15 RFRA claimants could not make a prima facie showing of a substantial burden on their 16 exercise of religion because they were "not fined or penalized ... for practicing their 17 religion" on public land. 535 F.3d at 1070. Yet where, as in the instant case, the RFRA 18 claimants have been threatened with fines and criminal penalties, they have satisfied a 19 showing of substantial burden.
20

25 Consider scenarios where a federal courthouse required removal of all head 26 coverings, or federal parks were open only on Sundays, a day on which followers of 27 some religious traditions might not be able to visit the parks on account of mandatory 28

1 observance of religious ceremony or services? Both of these federal policies about “how 2 to use its own land” could trigger non-trivial requests for accommodations under RFRA.

4 What is more, the Government’s argument that “the government’s choice of how 5 to use its own land cannot create a substantial burden” would effectively render RLUIPA 6 a nullity. “RLUIPA prohibits the implementation of any land use regulation that imposes 7 a ‘substantial burden’ on the religious exercise of a person ... except where justified by a 8 ‘compelling governmental interest’ that the government pursues in the least restrictive 9 way possible.” Statement of the Department of Justice on the Land Use Provisions of the 10 Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), June 13, 2018, pp. 1–2, 11 available at <https://www.justice.gov/crt/page/file/1071246/download>.
12

14 As former Attorney General Sessions made clear, “RFRA applies to all actions by 15 federal administrative agencies, including rulemaking, adjudication or other enforcement 16 actions, and grant or contract distribution and administration.” Attorney General Jeff 17 Sessions, “Federal Law Protections for Religious Liberty,” p. 1. The Government’s 18 position in this case, essentially immunizing all public land use or policy related to the 19 issuance of permits from any duty to accommodate individual religious liberty rights, 20 also runs contrary to the Attorney General’s clear instructions to all U.S. government 21 agencies: “to the greatest extent practicable and permitted by law, religious observance 22 and practice should be reasonably accommodated in all government activity.” Id.
23
24

25
26 The Government also argues in its brief in opposition to the Defendants’ RFRA-27 based motion to dismiss that the Defendants’ religious beliefs are not substantially 28 burdened because nothing in the defendants’ stated beliefs prevented them from 1 obtaining a permit to enter the Cabeza Prieta National Wildlife Refuge (CPNWR). Doc.

2 105 at 10. But it is not the Defendants’ position that they were barred from applying for 3 a permit to enter the CPNWR, rather, they argue, the conditions contained in the permits 4 required them to agree not to engage in religiously motivated conduct. In this sense, the 5 terms of the permit forced them a “to choose between the tenets of their religion and a 6 government benefit.” Navajo Nation, 535 F.3d at 1070. The instant case presents 7 different facts from those in contexts where faith-based actors sought religious 8 exemptions from the requirements of federal eagle feather permitting schemes such as 9 United States v. Hugs, wherein a permitting scheme “permitt[ed] access to eagles and 10 eagle parts for religious purposes,” albeit not in as convenient a manner as the defendants 11 would have liked.<sup>3</sup> 109 F.3d 1375, 1378–79 (9th Cir. 1997).

12
13 14
15 Next, the Government argues that the Defendants’ religious exercise is not 16 substantially burdened by this prosecution because there were other legally permitted 17 means by which they could have exercised their faith-based commitment to provide aid 18 to persons at risk of death or serious bodily injury. “There are many methods for 19 providing aid in the CPNWR, some of which do not violate the rules and regulations, and 20 the defendants’ preference for one method over another cannot create a substantial 21 burden.” Doc. 105 at 12. For several reasons, this construction of the notion of 22 “substantial burden” amounts to a significant narrowing of the protections for religious 23 liberty embodied in federal law, and is not at all supported by the Supreme Court’s 24
25
26
27 <sup>3</sup> Cf. U.S. v. Hardman, 297 F.3d 1116, 1126–27 (10th Cir. 2002) (“Any scheme that 28 limits [legitimate practitioners of Native American religions] access to eagle feathers therefore must be seen as having a substantial effect on the exercise of religious belief.”).

1 reading of RFRA.

2 The Government's position is that a RFRA claimant's religious beliefs are not 3 substantially burdened if the government can conjure acceptable religious alternatives to 4 violating the law. This reading of the reach of federal statutory protections for religious 5 liberty was presented to the Supreme Court by the government in Holt v. Hobbs, and the 6 Supreme Court rejected it: the "'substantial burden' inquiry asks whether the government 7 has substantially burdened religious exercise ..., not whether the [religious liberty] 8 claimant is able to engage in other forms of religious exercise." Holt v. Hobbs, 135 S.Ct.
9 at 862.

10 Ignoring this clear precedent, the Government reasserts a reading of RFRA, one 11 already rejected by the Supreme Court, that effectively substitutes the government's 12 assessment of what practices defendant's religion requires for that avowed by the faith-13 based actors themselves. Nothing in the legislative history of RFRA justifies this reading 14 of the statute, and indeed it amounts to putting the state in the position of assessing the 15 reasonableness of the RFRA claimant's beliefs, something the Supreme Court has 16 repeatedly declared that "the federal courts have no business addressing (whether the 17 religious belief asserted in a RFRA case is reasonable)." Hobby Lobby, 134 S.Ct. at 18 2778.

19 Indeed, the Government's position in this case conflicts with the Attorney 20 General's guidance to Justice Department lawyers on how to litigate RFRA cases: 21 "Religious adherents will often be required to draw lines in the application of their 22 religious beliefs, and government is not competent to assess the reasonableness of such 23
25
26
27
28

1 lines drawn, nor would it be appropriate for government to do so.” “Federal Law 2 Protections for Religious Liberty,” October 6, 2017, p. 4.

4 Another way to understand the Government’s parsimonious reading of RFRA is 5 that it urges the court to read into RFRA a requirement that the party seeking an 6 exemption show that their faith-based conduct is narrowly tailored to further their faith-7 based beliefs, thus minimizing the likelihood that their religious practices will violate the 8 law. Nothing in the language of RFRA, its legislative history, or the Supreme Court’s 9 interpretation thereof supports the novel approach to proving a substantial burden on 10 religious exercise as urged by the Government in their brief.

11 12 Accordingly, the framing of the notion of “substantial burden on religious 13 exercise” advanced by the Government in this case incorrectly elevates compliance with 14 the law as the baseline against which the RFRA claimant’s faith-based exemption is to be 15 assessed. Yet this has never been the starting point or baseline of the inquiry into 16 whether the RFRA claimant has articulated a substantial burden on their religious liberty.
17 Rather, RFRA requires that the Court consider whether sincerely held religious beliefs 18 have been substantially burdened by the state’s action, and if so an exemption from the 19 law is required unless the government can show that enforcement of the law in this 20 particular case is justified by a compelling governmental interest that is accomplished 21 through narrowly tailored means.

22 II. The Government’s Burden in Opposing the RFRA Motion

25
26
27 If the Defendants carry their burden of demonstrating that the prosecution herein 28 imposes a substantial burden on their ability to exercise their sincerely-held religious

1 beliefs, they are entitled to a RFRA exemption unless the government can show that the 2 burden is the least restrictive means of advancing a compelling government interest.

3 A. Does The Prosecution In The Instant Case *Further A Compelling State 4 Interest?

5 A compelling interest must be clearly articulated and specific; “broadly formulated 6 interests justifying the general applicability of government mandates” are not considered 7 compelling. O Centro, 546 U.S. at 430–31. “RFRA, and the strict scrutiny test it 8 adopted, contemplate an inquiry more focused than the Government’s categorical 9 approach. RFRA requires the Government to demonstrate that the compelling interest 10 test is satisfied through application of the challenged law ‘to the person’—the particular 11 claimant whose sincere exercise of religion is being substantially burdened.” Id. at 420.
12 As the Department of Justice has argued in other cases where it has supported the 13 assertion of a RFRA exemption, “mere generalized concerns . . . are insufficient to prove 14 a compelling governmental interest . . . the government the ‘must show a compelling 15 interest . . . in the particular case at hand, not a compelling interest in general.’” Jefferson 25 also Reaching Hearts Int’l, Inc. v. Prince George’s Cnty., 584 F. Supp. 2d 766, 788 (D.

26 Md. 2008) (“A ‘compelling interest’ is not a general interest but must be particular to a 27
28

1 specific case.”), aff’d, 368 F. App’x 370 (4th Cir. 2010) (per curiam).

2 In this case, the Government has not made this showing, rather it merely recites 3 broad aims for the legislation: “prosecution of the defendants for violating the regulations 4 regarding access to and use of the CPNWR furthers both the government’s compelling 5 interest in protecting the wilderness character of the CPNWR and securing the border 6 against illegal immigration to a meaningful degree.” Doc. 105 at 13. Of course it may be 7 that the Government could produce a particularized showing of a compelling interest at 8 stake in the prosecution of these Defendants, but it has not yet done so in its arguments 9 proffered to the Court to this point. “The uniform application of criminal laws argument, 10 as a compelling interest, has also been soundly rejected by the Supreme Court.” United 11 States v. Lepp, 2008 WL 3843283, *10 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 14, 2008), aff’d, 446 Fed. Appx.
12 44 (9th Cir. 2011) (citing O Centro, 546 U.S. at 434–35).

26
27
28 Established case law also instructs that the government may not rely on slippery slope arguments in its effort to make out a compelling interest in enforcing the law against a RFRA claimant. O Centro, 546 U.S. at 435–37. However, the Government’s brief relies on exactly such an argument: the Government’s compelling interest in this case, it argues, “includes the cumulative negative effects to the CPNWR and border security of allowing the defendants to continue to violate the regulations at issue in order to further illegal aliens’ entry into the United States.” Doc. 105 at 14.

Thus, to prevail in carrying its burden of showing that the substantial burden placed on Defendants’ sincerely held religious beliefs is justified by a compelling state interest, the Government must marshal a compelling interest in prosecuting these

1 defendants in this case.

2 B. Is The Burden Imposed On Defendants’ Religious Beliefs The Least 3 Restrictive Means Of Advancing A Compelling Government Interest?

4 To demonstrate that the application of the challenged law or policy is narrowly 5 tailored, the Government must show that it could not achieve its compelling interest to 6 the same degree while exempting the [party asserting the RFRA claim] from complying 7 in full with the [law].” Christie, 825 F.3d at 1061. This “focused inquiry” requires the 8 government to justify why providing an exemption would be unworkable. O Centro, 546 9 U.S. at 431.

10 11 12 The government’s brief with respect to this element misstates the kind of proof it 13 must produce in order to demonstrate that its compelling interest is sufficiently narrowly 14 tailored to satisfy RFRA’s exacting requirements. Rather than producing persuasive 15 evidence that the prosecution of the Defendants herein is necessary to accomplishing its 16 compelling interests as the clear text of the statute requires, the Government argues that 17 “[t]he prosecution in this case is a reasonable method for the government to advance its 18 compelling interests.” Doc. 105 at 15 (emphasis supplied). Its task, however, is to prove 19 that there are no alternative means of accomplishing the state’s compelling interests that 20 would be less burdensome on the defendants religious beliefs. The key question to be 21 answered at this stage in the RFRA analysis is whether robust, if not aggressive, criminal 22 prosecution of the Defendants is necessary to achieving the government’s interests in this 23 case? Might some other sanction accomplish those aims just as well, while imposing less 24 of a burden on the defendants’ exercise of religion? “The government must show ‘that it 25
26
27
28

1 lacks other means of achieving its desired goal without imposing a substantial burden on 2 the exercise of religion by the [plaintiffs].” Eternal World Television, 818 F.3d at 1158 3 (citation omitted). This is the question the court must resolve in determining whether the 4 Government has met its burden of showing that its actions are narrowly tailored to 5 accomplishing a compelling state interest in this case.

7           Regretfully, the Government supplements its mischaracterization of the “narrowly 8 tailored” test with the reassertion of a slippery slope argument: “permitting an exemption 9 for these four defendants would quickly lead to religious objections from all No More 10 Deaths volunteers regarding these same regulations.” Doc. 105 at 15. Just as the slippery 11 slope argument is unavailable to the government when making out a compelling interest, 12 it may not resort to slippery slope arguments in showing that the prosecution is necessary 13 to accomplishing those interests. Every part of the Government’s case under RFRA must 14 address the necessity of denying an exemption to these Defendants in this case, not 15 imagined parties in the future. Consider, for example, the facts in Hobby Lobby. At the 16 time that Hobby Lobby filed for an exemption from compliance with the Affordable Care 17 Act under RFRA, it was well known that there were many other employers who would 18 assert such an exemption should Hobby Lobby prevail in the courts. It was completely 19 foreseeable that hundreds, if not thousands, of employers would assert a RFRA-based 20 exemption from compliance with the contraception mandate should the Court rule in 21 favor of Hobby Lobby. Yet, at no time did the possibility, or even inevitability, of future 22 exemptions play a role in the Court’s consideration of the specific assertion of a religious 23 liberty right by Hobby Lobby. It could be said that RFRA protects specific assertions of
25
26
27
28

1 a right to religious liberty on a retail, not wholesale, basis, and each request for an 2 exemption must be examine on its own terms. “Only those interests of the highest order 3 can outweigh legitimate claims to the free exercise of religion, and such interests must be 4 evaluated not in broad generalities but as applied to the particular adherent.” United 5 States Attorneys’ Manual (USAM) Respect for Religious Liberty, 1-15.300.14. Thus, the 6 Government’s argument that “[i]f the government were to grant an exemption in this 7 case, these same volunteers would also seek exemptions,” is inapposite. Doc. 105 at 16.

10 The Government draws to a close its argument on the “narrowly tailored” element 11 by arguing that “[t]he result [of granting an exemption in this case] would be a two-tier 12 class of visitors to the CPNWR – those who are required to obey the regulations, and 13 those who may ignore the regulations to the detriment of other lawful visitors. The 14 resulting chaos, including the confusion caused by law-abiding visitors seeing others 15 openly disobey the regulations, would seriously hamper the government’s ability to 16 enforce the regulations to further its interests.” Doc. 105 at 16. This conclusion is, quite 17 frankly, rather surprising coming from the representatives of a government that has 18 emphatically declared that the protection of religious liberty is among its highest 19 priorities. The very idea of RFRA is to create specific exemptions to compliance with 20 regulations that apply generally to all others. To characterize the result of granting 21 RFRA-based exemptions as “chaos” indicates a general hostility to the very idea of the 22 government accommodating religious belief in specific cases.

23 Both the compelling interest and least restrictive means analyses are questions of 24 law that can be properly addressed on a motion to dismiss. See United States v. Friday,

1 525 F.3d 938, 949 (10th Cir. 2008) (“We now conclude, as other circuits have, that both 2 prongs of RFRA’s strict scrutiny test are legal questions.”); Christie, 825 F.3d at 1056
3 (“We review the district court’s compelling-interest and least-restrictive-means 4 conclusions de novo.”).
